

I do not believe the FCC should implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. The current laws have been effective in reducing undesired solicitations at my home and preventing interruption of what little time I have with my family after work and other responsibilities. Since I registered pursuant to Indiana's telephone privacy laws, unwanted calls have been reduced from approximately 3 per day/evening to maybe 1-2 every other week. I believe it is important for states to have the discretion to provide their own laws and programs in this regard as the needs of citizens in various areas may differ and state officials should have a better idea of what is right for their citizens. Thanks for your consideration.
